

WALT WILSON

Walt Wilson is the founder and chairman of Internet ministry Global Media Outreach (GMO). He was previously co-founder, chairman and CEO of Exclaim Technologies, Inc., an applications service provider in the business-to-business Internet market. Before that, he served as senior vice president and corporate officer of the consulting group Computer Sciences Corp. (CSC), a $16 billion, U.S. global corporation with 600 offices worldwide, employing over 100,000 people.

With over 40 years experience as an operating executive, Wilson has served in a variety of management positions with three Fortune 50 companies. Prior to CSC, he was an early employee of Apple Computer, serving as managing director of U.S. operations as the company grew from just a start-up to a globally-recognized corporation with $5 billion in revenues. He has spent most of his career with Silicon Valley-based companies.

In addition, Wilson is an international speaker, with engagements at corporate management meetings, government conferences, universities and executive seminars. His presentations examine the impact of emerging technologies on economics, business process, social and political systems.

A past and present board member of many Silicon Valley corporations, Wilson has also served on the board of Bob Buford's Leadership Network in Dallas, a strategy development organization for the growth of the Christian Church. He was also chairman of the National Advisory Board for Christianity.com and author of the book, "Internet Church," published and distributed by Thomas Nelson/Word Publishing Company. Wilson is a contributing editor and monthly columnist for Christian Computing Magazine and is a member of the technology council of 20,000-member Saddleback Church in Lake Forest, Calif.

Prior to his business career, Wilson served three years active duty with the United States Marine Corps.
